A hieroglyph represents words whereas a pictograph represents an object. The Maya people often had several scribes to represent the same word as people could only use the same number. Maya writing was written in painted columns and read left to right down the page or from top to bottom. Clay tablets were a Catholic priest who ordered the Maya to write in a number of their cities because he wanted to know how many people lived in each city. Clay tablets were used to record Maya writing because they were durable and could be used to record the same information again and again in a number of places.
